Prepare to Be Inviolated

Atlanta Hardcore Band Plays Metal With a Twist

Andy Lassiter
Contributing Writer

Atlanta-based band Inviolate is not your typical hardcore band. Original songs blend genres like electronica, industrial, metal, and rock. During shows, the band thrashes violently on stage, intensely focused on their music, working crowds into a frenzy. But Inviolate still has a leg up on other bands in the scene: lead singer Kadria.

Backed by Bryon Brown on guitar, Chris Farmer on bass, and Joe Drew on drums, singer and belly dancer Kadria brings something extra to Inviolate. As a founding member, Kadria is the driving force behind the band. Her intense singing and scream vocals are set off by her startling stage presence, good looks, and the noticeable influence of Middle-Eastern belly dancing.

While hardcore music and belly dancing don't exactly seem like a perfect match, the diminutive singer says the incorporation of eastern inspired dance was more of an organic progression. "I started [belly dancing] at practice one day and the guys were like, oh, cool, let's see what we can do with that. You know, real open, real positive about it," says Kadria, who has been a student of dance for years. Since then, the belly dancing has turned into a major element of the live show.

But don't let Kadria's performance distract you from the music. Their sound is hard hitting, in your face, high energy American hardcore rock. Over the last four years, Inviolate has solidified a space for themselves in the competitive Atlanta music scene. The four-piece outfit has the ripping guitar licks, complex bass lines, pounding double bass drum fills, and extreme vocal work that is synonymous with hardcore music. The combination can mesmerize their often boisterous audiences.

Inviolate will unleash their heavy sounds for the first time in Charleston this Saturday at the Oasis on Folly Road. Excited for the opportunity, the band is hoping to make a big impression on Charleston. Currently concentrating on their live show, in preparation for shooting their first music video next month, Inviolate has plans to record a full-length album in the spring.

As for what to expect at the show on Saturday, "Be prepared," says Kadria. "That's all I can say. Because it's not like anything you've seen before. Again, you're gonna have a female in front, dancing to heavy metal. Be prepared to thrash. Be prepared to move. Be prepared to dance. Just be prepared to experience something that you've never seen before."

Inviolate will play The Oasis is located at 778 Folly Road on Sat. Dec. 5. For more info, call 225-2522
